

My Story....

On a rural farm in Historic Boley, Oklahoma, no one not even the attending midwife would have suspected that the baby would grow up to birth one of Oklahoma's oldest restaurants. Legendary for its fresh homemade food with little or no deviation from the techniques and recipes she learned as she performed her weekly task of churning butter. She studied her mother's every move and honed the skill that is obvious in every bite of her food.

Life on a working farm is hard, the day starts early and share cropping is a family commitment. Everyone from the oldest to the toddler has a job. The dedication and hard work it takes to be a share cropper builds the stamina you need to work 17 hours a day building your brand.

Florence Jones-Kemp opened the doors to Florence's Restaurant in April of 1952 at 916 N.E. 4th Street. In 1969 she built the building that still houses the business she started so many years ago. At over 90 years old, what will happen to the business she spent her life building? History repeats itself, with the little girl who grow up watching every move her mother and grandmother made in the restaurant. The next generation steps in and expands the dream.

With its country chic décor, walls adorned with art from local artist, professional service and atmosphere that will transport you back to your grandmother's kitchen. This is the place where a country cooking is the norm and you can have Sunday dinner everyday.

At a time when the importance of whole, healthy, homemade food has become relevant Florence's is fast becoming nationally known for not only its food but its dedication to the earth.
